

Susan Condor:

“I am a social psychologist, and my own research interests concern everyday understandings of political events and processes. I have been involved with ISPP for some years, and value my membership of this supportive international and interdisciplinary community of scholars. I hope that in future ISPP will continue to develop the relationship between psychological research and policy issues, and more generally to exemplify the mutual benefits that follow from academic psychology’s engagement with public life. I look forward to seeing a further geographical diversification of ISPP membership, and a consequent further synergistic development of theoretical perspectives and methods in political psychology.”
