

Anca Minescu:

“For the last few years, I attended the ISPP conferences with enthusiasm about their diversity in topics and approaches. In my research, I investigate intergroup relationships embedded in particular ethno-national settings. I focus on social psychological processes that mediate the effects of social-political systems on people’s political engagement or disengagement. Studying intergroup processes requires inter-disciplinary dialogue and complementarity, as well as validation across contexts. To my mind, ISPP provides a great opportunity for exchanging ideas and methodologies across disciplinary and national boundaries. For me, ISPP represents an informative forum promoting social change, because of its potential in gathering expertise and research-based knowledge.”
